The effect of "prosperity" was strikingly illustrated in one of the groceries in this city yesterday. A farmer who drove in some ten miles with thirty-six bushels of potatoes and sold them for fifty cents a bushel, did not lose fifteen minutes before he commenced to "bowl up," and before he left for home was uncomfortably full. Last year he brought several loads in, selling them for fifteen and twenty cents per bushel and went home sober every time. A difference of thirty-five cents a bushel in the price of potatoes made more prosperity than he could stand.

While the sidewalks about the city are in unusually bad condition it does seem as though it has quite ceased to be a matter of patience when one of our five iron bridges should be closed to traffic for three weeks, condemned by the street commissioner, simply because it needs replanking. Such is the case with the Mulberry street bridge. While the action of the street commissioner in closing it when he saw it was unsafe is of course all right, the neglect to have it replanked at once does not seem to be excusable in the least.
